

Did you hear that? Hello? In recent times, Auditory Processing Disorder has gone from being virtually unheard of to something that now is said to affect at least 5% of school children. While this disorder has been around for a long time, awareness has only been on the rise in the last few years. Do you have difficulty distinguishing sounds from one another in a noisy room? Do you find it hard to follow long conversations without missing hearing or missing interpreting what is being said? Do you easily forget instructions that have been spoken to you? Are your organizational skills not as good as you think they should be? These are just some of the possible symptoms that many face when they have Auditory Processing Disorder. Many doctors have misdiagnosed patients, usually saying they have some type of ADD or ADHD, thus prescribing to unneeded medication. Auditory Processing Disorder (APD), which is also known as Central Auditory Processing Disorder (CAPD), is characterized as the brain having problems making sense of the sounds that it hears, often confusing the person affected.
