

There was a time, and I think the Ancient Greeks may have been around, when people (the ones who get into the history books, not the common muck) used to speak about the meaning of life. Later people used to talk about religion and war a lot, looking for meaning in the meta or just killing a lot of people and taking their stuff. Today people talk about football. Footballers are the warriors and spiritual leaders of the 21st century, although pop singers did get a brief look in towards the end of the 20th. Soldiers like Wellington or Alexander would be proud of the way fans discuss tactics and of which line up to deploy depending on how well or badly the troops are faring, and of course, when to send in the reserves. Martin Luther or Thomas More would envy the intensity of feeling towards players and teams and the sacrifices made to family and factory in order to dedicate ourselves so wholeheartedly to our cause. There are some pitiful creatures who think that football is simple; that it consists of 22 men running about after a ball. Such people are like those who believe that a television is simple, needing only 5 minutes messing about with a remote control to be fully understood. Football is in fact the most complex activity known to Man, and one that stretches him to the full.
